

'America: No Purchase Necessary' is a feel-good story about acceptance. One of the many perks of winning the national 'America's Family' Sweepstakes is the chance to meet and make appearances with the President on his reelection campaign. When an eclectic African-American family becomes the unexpected winner of the prestigious 'America's Family' contest, the President and his shiesty reelection campaign manager tries to get the family disqualified, thinking that this particular family isn't 'American-looking' enough, and to appear with them on the campaign trail will hurt the President's chance of getting reelected. Without being preachy, 'America: No Purchase Necessary' gives a lighthearted glimpse into American politics while simultaneously showing a realistic snapshot of life in contemporary America. Just like any other family in America, the Lanterns have autism, transgender issues, and even a grandmother who've come up with her own interesting alternative to plant-based burgers. 'America: No Purchase Necessary' is an entertaining political satire that looks at race relations in America, and it shows the sometimes-ugly side of America while simultaneously reflecting the goodness in certain people that highlights America's beauty as well. If you or your family ever felt left out, pushed out or shut out then Randolph Randy Camp's 'America: No Purchase Necessary' is a story for you.
