Tears dripping from a rainbow

Wow, what a wonderful expression that is! I personally interpret this as “tears of joy or relief,” knowing that a rainbow appears when the storm is over and thus life can resume it’s more desirable period of calm once again.

That’s what it’s all about, isn’t it? Deep inside, I think we just want to live in peace, don’t we? Peace on Earth and good will towards all people. Wouldn’t it be nice if that were our reality? Wouldn’t it be nice? I’m sorry to say that it’s a bit hard to even imagine how that might be in the rather convoluted world we live in.

This whole emotional rollercoaster ride that we so frequently find ourselves on has perhaps become so commonplace that we have in great part lost sight of the rainbow. Under those circumstances, it unfortunately becomes easy to lose hope for ever again seeing that wondrous celestial display in what has become our normal more stormy existence.

More often than not and than we would desire, we may be living under a black cloud, watching the lightning strike and feeling the roar of the thunder. And what a sad statement that is. Sorry about that. Maybe you’re different from most people though and are blessed with a cloudless, sunny sky the majority of the time. I hope that’s true. I sincerely do.

But whatever the case, life does go on and rainbows will keep appearing. Taking that into account, we must maintain our faith that with our efforts and willpower, there will always be opportunities for a brighter, sunnier future, with many soft, warm, multi-colored, joyous tears gently streaming down our cheeks.

Quite ironically, when we get off the emotional roller coaster, it is we ourselves who become the rainbow! Imagine that.
